Special Issue on Basic, Applied & Social Sciences of IJCAES is a collection of research findings from various authors. Mixed responses have been found from authors and researchers working in various emerging research areas of basic, applied & social sciences.

In this issue we have included thirty five peer-reviewed papers which discuss various issues in a wide variety of problem domain. This issue includes eight papers from basic and applied science, four paper of management sciences and twenty three papers of various social science research areas. It can be seen from the collection of social science papers that, researchers are becoming more concern about the problems or issues related to the various tribes of the North-Eastern states of India. It can be considered as a good sign. There is a huge scope for social science researchers in this area. They can take initiatives towards systematic study of various issues such as culture, lifestyle etc. of the people living in this part of the country. Especially, it may help a lot in the preservation of culture and other related information of some of the tribes with very less population.

We are planning to publish a new international research journal to facilitate wide accessibility of the worthy research works of basic sciences, applied sciences as well as social sciences researchers. With that objective, a special issue of IJCAES is published in July 2012 covering the emerging research areas of basic, applied and social sciences. In this issue we are publishing some additional research papers. We are trying to provide scopes to the young researchers working in various current and emerging areas of basic, applied & social sciences. We hope that the content of this volume will encourage the young and perspective researchers and also open up new research areas for future researchers.
